ABSTRACT

As a statistical tabulation based on raw data collected by the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, this report presents tables of data which illustrate trends in black school segregation from 1970-1974. The statistics provide a detailed profile of the pattern of black enrollment in schools with various proportions of minority students (American Indian, Asian American, Spanish Surnamed American, and others). They show the number and percentage of black students and the number and percent of the district's schools at each level of segregation or integration each year. Statistics have been gathered for all fifty states according to five regions: northeast, border, south, mid-west, west. Alaska and Hawaii have been excluded. The detailed statistical profiles of 204 school districts with more than 20,000 students enrolled permit examination of trends in middle size cities and a number of major suburban and metropolitan school systems as well as the 100 largest systems (the only ones on which DHEW data was previously available). A short introduction provides historical background and analyses of school segregation. (Author/PR)

Eugene T. Lowe and William L. Taylor of the Center for National Policy Review are principally responsible for this published report. Gary Orfield, of the University of Illinois, wrote the introduction concerning the history and use of school desegregation statistics. Vickey Shay, Joy Taylor, and Ann Sykes-Dixon of the Center for National Policy Review also contributed valuable clerical help in the preparation of this report.

The data presented here, though, was collected by the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Because of financial constraints, however, HEW was unable to fully edit and publish a report. The Center for National Policy Review obtained the raw data that had been collected and proposed to the National Institute of Education that it be published.

TRENDS IN BLACK SCHOOL SEGREGATION, 1970-74

Introduction

Gary Orfield
University of Illinois, Urbana

Each year since the 1954 Supreme Court decision, the statistics of school segregation have attracted wide public attention. In contrast to the normal disinterest in statistical tabulations, these trends have been seen as important measures of the nation's race relations progress. It is almost as if unconstitutional segregation was a serious national disease and the segregation statistics were a kind of fever chart. The statistics in this volume report on the condition of the virus during the first five years of the 1970's.* To the extent that statistics are an indication, they show, in brief, that the South is continuing its long and increasingly robust recovery while the remainder of the country remains severely afflicted. The disease has reached new heights in the Northeast.

Reports of school segregation statistics have had a checkered history and this volume is no exception. For many years, school segregation was widely thought to be a problem limited to the seventeen states with segregation laws in 1954. Northern and Western school boards often refused to make any counts, simply stating that they never discriminated and that it would be an affront to children to count them racially.

Reports on segregation trends during the '50's dealt very largely with the Southern situation and were produced with no official involvement. The statistics were gathered by newspapermen working in the various states and published by the Southern Education Reporting Service, a voluntary, foundation-financed clearinghouse in Nashville, Tenn. SERS was founded by prominent newspaper editors and educators from the region and dedicated to impartial reporting of what was happening.

Changes in the nature of the reports over the years illustrated the changing shape of the issue. The early goal of the civil rights movement was merely to begin some kind of token integration somewhere in a few school districts in a state. Once a district had begun the process by putting even a few black children in a single grade of a single white school, the district was listed as "desegregated." Even by these standards desegregation spread very slowly in most of the eleven states of the former Confederacy. The federal government collected no statistics, wishing to avoid the issue altogether.

During the first ten years after the 1954 decision, there was little to report. During the 1963-64 school year only about one percent of the South's black pupils were in integrated schools. After the enactment of the 1964 Civil Rights Act brought the federal government into the process of enforcing the constitutional requirments, both the rate of change and the nature of the statistics collected changed drastically.

The federal government became the basic collector of enrollment statistics and has remained so. During the first year of serious enforcement of the 1964 law, desegregation began in virtually all Southern school systems. By stages, attention shifted toward statistics reporting how much actual integration had been accomplished and how many black students were in predominantly white schools.

During the next several years there were several changes in the collection and publishing of the data, reflecting the evolution of legal requirements and new understandings of the segregation problem. Under strong pressure from Southerners, who claimed that the North was ignoring its own severe problem, HEW began collecting statistics across the country from all districts of any size with significant minority enrollments. Increasingly the statistics were collected not only on the segregation of black children but on the situation of Spanish-surname, Indian, and Asian Children as well.* Finally the standard of desegregation also changed, at least in the minds of many scholars, after the Supreme Court's 1971 decision sustaining a city-wide desegregation plan in Charlotte-Mecklenburg, N.C. Since 1971 there has been a common tendency to assume that an ideally desegregated school system is one where every school has approximately the same racial composition. Statistical measures have been devised to calculate what proportion of children in various school districts would have to be moved to achieve this pattern of proportionate enrollment.

The figures offered in the statistics provided here do not depend on any particular definition of segregation. They provide a detailed year-by-year profile of the pattern of black enrollment in schools with various proportions of minority students. They show the number and percentage of black students and the number and percent of the district's schools at each level of segregation or integration each year. Thus a reader can both search for consistent trends within a given system and compare systems with others of similar size and racial composition.

* Statistics are now being collected by OCR on other kinds of problems such as pushouts, disciplinary action, classroom segregation, etc. These statistics have not been published yet.

Users of these statistics should be aware of both their incomplete form and the unusual conditions of their production. HEW developed a procedure of full national surveys and estimates of national segregation trends every even-numbered year. In odd-numbered years, this information was supplemented with a limited survey of large districts. The national data for the 1970 and 1972 surveys was published in huge directories containing information on the racial composition of each individual school.

The pattern was broken, however, in 1975. No survey was conducted that year. Nor was the 1974 data released or published. There was very serious discussion of eliminating the national survey for 1976. All policy discussions still turned on outdated 1972 information.

Finally, in response to a 1976 Senate request for more recent information, HEW contracted with DBS Corporation to prepare the following tables. But because of financial constraints, HEW made no plans to publish a statistical report as it had in the past. Believing the data to be vital to educational research and decision-making, as well as important in determining the compliance of school systems with civil rights laws, the Center for National Policy Review proposed to the National Institute of Education for a grant to publish this report.

In preparing the statistical tables, DBS worked with files that were sometimes not complete or fully edited. Since the Senate request asked for information on trends in the 1970s, the analyses was necessarily limited to those school districts that had consistently submitted data to HEW throughout this five year period.

Users of the data should, therefore, examine the 1974 entries to note whether there has been a sudden single-year drop in the number of students and schools covered by the survey. A few systems, such as New York City failed to submit data for a number of schools in 1974. Although many school systems are shrinking, a drastic acceleration of the trend in the 1974 data should lead the reader to rely on the 1973 information or check further with the school system of interest to the reader. Readers of the tables summarizing regional and national data should also make careful note of the varying coverage of black students in different regions.*

The national statistics are based on school districts estimated to contain more than nine-tenths of the black students in U.S. public schools. A full report might show a slightly lower rate of segregation since segregation tends to be greater in the larger districts with substantial minority enrollment which are more fully represented in the tabulations. The basic trends, however, are apparent.

The detailed statistical profiles of 204 school districts with more than 20,000 enrollment offer a kind of information never before published by HEW. Previously HEW issued occasional releases on the status of the 100 largest systems. This tabulation reaches farther down into the ranks of important districts, permitting examination of trends in middle size cities and a number of major suburban and metropolitan school systems.

* Readers should also note that the statistics of some cities may have been altered by desegregation orders. Cities such as Dallas, Baltimore, Milwaukee, Omaha, and Boston have been recently under these orders.

Merely studying the tables on a few consecutive pages should be sufficient to illustrate the extreme differences in segregation among major school systems of similar size. On one page the reader will find a district (usually Southern) with virtually no predominantly minority schools. On the next page there will be statistics from an old industrial city in the North where few black students attend school with less than 90 percent minority children and most are in schools with virtually no whites. The statistics from most of the major Florida systems, for example, stand at a polar extreme in comparison with a system like Chicago, where 80 percent of the black children are in schools with 99-100 percent minority enrollment. In many of the Florida districts no black students attend such schools.

As ghettos and barrios continue to rapidly expand in cities and in some inner suburbs, the number of segregated schools continues to rise even though a growing list of central city systems have stable or declining black enrollment. In Los Angeles, for example, the number of schools with 99-100 percent minority enrollment climbed from 67 in 1970 to 105 five years later, an increase of more than 50 percent although black enrollment fell. The expansion of housing segregation and the aging of remaining central city white families produces a very rapid decline in white enrollment even in school districts with very high levels of segregation.

The community profiles show the consequences of court orders in many Southern school systems since the Supreme Court's 1971 urban desegregation decisions. They show the very limited impact of the court's 1973 Denver decision on urban segregation outside the South. Very few Northern desegregation plans had been implemented by 1974-75.

The tables also reveal very wide variation among the plans implemented in various communities. In contrast to the plans distributing minority students proportionately throughout major districts, some plans preserved far more segregation. In Houston and Miami, for example the plans relied heavily on desegregating black schools with children of another minority group, the Latinos. Because of this approach, in 1974,78 percent of Houston's black children and 44 percent of Miami's were in schools with more than 90 percent minority enrollment.

One other issue deserving attention in the community statistics is the fact that there is now a considerable body of experience with desegregation that has taken place on a metropolitan-wide or urban county basis. Among the major districts with several years of experience are Nashville-Davidson, Tenn., Charlotte-Mecklenburg, N.C., Hillsborough (metro Tampa), Greenville, S.C., Duval (metro Jacksonville), Clark (metro Las Vegas), and several others. Most of these systems show a pattern of lasting desegregation and high retention of white pupils.

Questions about the collection of this data should be directed to the HEW Office for Civil Rights. Technical questions should be addressed to DBS Corp., 1515 Wilson Blvd., Arlington, Va. 22209. Other questions may be directed to the Center for National Policy Review.
